Hard Drive Secrets

Hard Drive Secrets is a musical podcast exploring the most unexpected and unconventional creations of artists and producers.

Far from the genres they are known for, away from club-oriented music and outside conventional musical formats, the show brings to light productions that would otherwise remain hidden — tracks that were never released, and probably never will be.

For each episode, producers are invited to dig into their hard drives and share some of their rarest, strangest and most atypical productions: music they might never play in a club, where an audience can sometimes be resistant to anything that falls outside the expected.

Hard Drive Secrets is a space for forgotten, unfinished, experimental and unclassifiable music — a place where artists can share the side of their work that usually stays on the hard drive.

Visual Identity

The visual identity of Hard Drive Secrets is fairly simple. It consists of macro photographs of hard drives, processors, and other computer components, combined with glitch textures, distorted imagery, and VHS-style visual artifacts.

There should be no artist photos in this music series, unless the artist explicitly requests it. The visual identity should remain focused on the relationship between technology, digital imagery, glitches, and physical hardware.
